Family Wrap-Up Recap

The page for the family, after the season of casseroles ends

The lasagnas stop, and life quietly gets lighter. This page marks the end of the meal train — some numbers, some gratitude, and a gentle look at what you might want next. Nothing here is homework.

Season recap

What happened	Count	Notes worth keeping
Days covered by delivered meals
Friends who pitched in
Meals that fed us more than once (double batches)
Groceries / staples / gift cards received
Thank-yous still owed (names)

What actually helped most

This part is yours to keep — it's exactly what you'll want to tell the next friend who offers.

The best part was: _____

Something I didn't expect to need: _____

Next time I'll ask for: _____

What I want someone to know about our weeks: _____

Gentle next steps

Move	Done?	When
Send last thank-yous (two-line texts count)	☐
Return borrowed pans, pots, serving dishes	☐
Use up or re-label freezer meals for the next stretch	☐
Stock two easy "hard day" meals before life goes back to normal	☐
Offer to captain the next train for someone else (you now know the trick)	☐

One honest thing: if the casserole parade ending feels lonelier than it did before, that's normal — the food was also the proof that people were watching out for you. Keep the delivery-day log; the names on it are your starters for staying in touch.

Pass it on: this kit is free, and this page plus the sign-up sheet is all anyone needs to run the next one. Hand someone a copy the way someone handed you lasagna.
